Hi, I'm DigiPoc.Com fan site. Source: [PC][Steam][Beta] [English] the inner window is very large, so the outer screen shows the whole scene and therefore the player cannot see any details unless they zoom in more. The view is broken down into smaller amounts per level by dividing the space into smaller portions and display these in a grid pattern in the upper left corner. These smaller segments make it easier for a player to see details, but you will see more details if you choose to zoom in. Filtering content on fly: Make the background of the scene depend on the content of the current scene. This is done by setting the background of the scene to be the SceneManager.CurrentScene. These values can be animated or static, so you can make an "in and out" or "highlight and normal" transition. This is what you would do if you wanted to show off the GUI for a certain set of content, you would change the current

SceneManager.CurrentScene to display the GUI to make it more visible. The GUI can then remain visible throughout the scene. Another, more graphically intensive example would be if you want to show off the detail of a new game mechanic, you would change the current scene to have one that shows the player interacting with the game mechanic. When the player interacts with the mechanic you move the SceneManager.CurrentScene to the other scene that shows what happens when the mechanic is interacted with. I hope this helps someone. This example works on a Unity editor build, but I believe you can use it as is on a build that is meant for Android devices, (I am looking into this right now) I don't know when this will be ready, but if you are looking to add your own custom scenes to your own builds, this might be a good way to go. Just a small disclaimer. This feature requires the 2.0.3 version of Unity. EDIT: That said, there are a couple of things I did not take into account when creating these scenes. For example the location of the scene is not affected by the view of the camera. So, if your camera is still looking at the player, you can still see into the opposite half of the world. This can be easily fixed by setting the camera to the void (OR ANY other object), This will allow the scene to be bff6bb2d33
